Elihu Law was a big, heavy looking man, with a straight mouth, small, stern eyes and reddish hair. Monica sometimes thought that her chief reason for marrying him was that she had been afraid to say "no" to him. After eleven years of married life she was still afraid to ask him such a question as she now felt to be necessary. "Well," he returned. "Elihu, I—Elizabeth must have a pair of school shoes today. was large and he saved a great deal of it. He never stinted himself, and he always gave money wherever it would win for him popular recognition. He was considered generous, but the man who would subscribe fifty dollars to a notable charity curtly refused to give his wife the price of a pair of shoes. "If only I had a little money of my own." Monica thought, sadly.

She had been one or a large family, and had not a dollar to ner name when he married her. Her parents never had been able to do anything for her. She was absolutely dependent upon her husband, and he never allowed her to forget this fact for a moment. She cared more on Elizabeth's account than her own. Elizabeth was ten, and beginning to notice things. She saw that their home was different, and her own clothes poorer than 1-hose of the girls whose fathers had less than hers. Monica contrived and planned. She was clever with the needse and an adept at economy. She would make one dollar do the work of five. As long as she could she put off asking Elihu for money. She hated scenes, and one threatened every time she proclaimed a need, however urgent. She was sorry that Elizabeth had been present when she asked for the shoe money, but she had thought that a glance at the child's feet would convince him of the justice had thought that a glance at the child's feet would convince him of the justice

MONEY A GOLDEN KEY.

"And I didn't even know that he was dead." Monica murmured.

Ten thousand dollars! Dropped in her lap from the sky, as it were. Twice in her life she had seen this strange, silent, hermitlike David Penfield, her father's cousin. And he had left her $10,000.

She sat holding the yellow bonds in her husband visible from ochind the morning paper. A faint tremor shook her, and the color shot into her delicate cheeks. "Elihu—dear," she began.

He glanced at her over the paper. Elihu Law was a big, heavy looking man, with a straight mouth, small, "God hess David Penfield." she cried. "God helss David Penfield." she cried. Monica sighed. "It's three months, and these are no longer fit for her to go out in."

"You should teach her to take better care of her things, then. I wear my shoes a year." He threw down his paper, and, rose from the table.

Monica rose, too. She bit her lips. "Aren't you going to leave me the money, Elihu? I'd like to go down town this morning."

His response was the closing of the door.

Monica sank back in her chair and covered her face with her hands.
Elizabeth came and leaned against her. "Can't I have my shoes, mamma?" she appealed.

Monica did not say anything; then he took her in his arms, "So the old hermit left you $10,000? Why didn't you tell' me, you little humburg?" he cried, gayly.

"Do you always tell me your affairs?"

"But this is different."

She drew away from him. Independence made her brave. "It is not different, Elihu."

"Well, have it your own way. The main thing is you've got the money. Don't you want me to invest it to a better advantage for veu? You ought to be getting 7 or 8 per cent on that amount of money."

"I am using my own money," Monica answered.

"Where'd you get any money?"

Monica told him. For a few minutes he did not say anything; then he took her in his arms,

"So the old hermit left you $10,000?
